What is the Learning Centre?

- Our purpose is to help students at all levels to build or adjust the skills needed for university.
- We have expertise in English linguistics and education.
- Our help is free of charge to all students who are enrolled at Sydney Uni.
Academic expectations

As a university student, you are expected to:

- be autonomous: motivate yourself, know how to find and use information
- manage a large and irregular workload
- attend lectures and submit assignments on time
- actively seek help and information when you need it
- think, read and write analytically and critically
- write the right academic genre for an assignment (e.g. essay, report, case study, critical review, annotated bibliography, etc)
- behave with academic honesty (i.e. correct referencing and no plagiarism)
What we can do for you

Learning Centre services

- Individual appointments
- Support programs within some specific units of study
- Online resources - e.g. Help Yourself or The Write Site
- Central workshops throughout the year
The Learning Centre provides resources for students to build and extend the skills they need for study and research at university.

The Learning Centre’s services include a wide range of workshops throughout the year on academic writing, research and other skills, as well as individual consultations, discipline-specific support programs within some faculties, and both online and print resources for students.

We are located on the Camperdown and Cumberland campuses, and are committed to helping both undergraduate and postgraduate students achieve their academic goals.

What is the right way to write references?

There are quite a few different ways of writing references (also called citations). The referencing conventions (also called citation styles) are usually named after a university or professional body which uses them, or which wrote the rules (e.g. Harvard, American Psychological Association, Oxford). Generally, each discipline, school, department and/or faculty has one or more systems which they prefer students to use.

Students should be told which system to use by their lecturer, school, department and/or faculty at the beginning of the year or semester – either in a set of general guidelines, the outline for the unit of study or in the instructions for a particular assignment. Occasionally, students will be allowed to choose the citation style they prefer, as long as it is consistently used. If you don’t know what referencing system is expected, however, it is a good idea to ask.

References in an essay or other academic text usually have two parts. The first part is inside your text, immediately after the source material you are paraphrasing or quoting. This first part is very short: depending on what system you are using, it is usually either just a number – e.g. [1] for a numbered set of footnotes, or [3] for a numbered set of endnotes – or else a set of brackets enclosing the author(s) and year of publication – e.g. (Oppenheimer & Rata, 2007).

The second part of the reference/citation contains the complete details about the source. Depending on the system you are using, it is either in a footnote at the bottom of the page, in a numbered list of endnotes at the end of your paper, or in an alphabetical reference list at the end of your paper.

Different citation conventions have different rules about the order of information and formatting such as underlining, italics and punctuation. These are set out in published referencing/citation style guides for each system, which you can find in the library. You can use software such as Endnote if you have a lot of references, to automatically apply the right format to each reference. Endnote can be downloaded for free from the library’s site. The library also runs classes on using Endnote. (See links to the library on the right.)

LEARNING RESOURCES FOR STUDENTS

Online Resources

- The Getting Your Message Across in Science site provides guidelines and examples of how to give a successful oral presentation and how to make a poster. Authentic footage of student presentations given in the School of Biological Sciences is used to illustrate the skills of presenting. In addition, activities in evaluating both oral presentations and posters are included.

- The Write Site provides online support to help you develop your academic and professional writing skills. There are modules on grammar, using sources and structuring assignments.

- The WRiSE (Writing a Report in Science and Engineering) site is an online learning environment designed to help you develop and improve your report writing skills in science and engineering.

- The Write site contains interactive tutorials to help engineering students to improve their assignment writing across the undergraduate years. It is especially useful for students writing their 3rd or 4th year thesis or project report.

- Help Yourself provides quick answers to the most common questions and problems for students, from first year undergraduates to PhD students. It also includes links to follow for more detailed information.
The Write Site provides online support to help you develop your academic and professional writing skills.

Each module provides descriptions of common problems in academic and professional writing and strategies for addressing them. You will see samples of good writing and also do some practice activities in error correction.
