Environmental Justice 2017: Looking Back, Looking Forward

Sydney Environment Institute at the University of Sydney is pleased to host a major conference on Environmental Justice, 20 years after Australia’s first conference on the topic at the University of Melbourne.

The conveners and organisers have worked to assemble a broadly interdisciplinary group of scholars, along with practitioners and activists, to address a wide range of issues in environmental justice studies. From climate justice to food justice, from indigenous communities to small island states, from just adaptation to multispecies justice - we look forward to reflections on past scholarship and current innovations and trends.

After an overwhelming response to our call for proposals, we welcome presenters from many countries, whose research spans the globe. We look forward to harnessing these diverse perspectives to critically investigate what we’ve already learned and to examine the key challenges and directions for future work in the field of environmental justice.

⇒ SYDNEY IDEAS: The Future of Environmental Justice
6.00—7.30PM
Law LT 101 New Law School, Eastern Ave, University of Sydney

Environmental justice has been one of the central organizing discourses of environmental and climate change movements over the last 30 years. While initially focused on the inequity of the distribution of environmental bads (and goods), especially as they impacted poor communities and communities of colour in the US, the idea has expanded to take on a broad range of issues, and a range of demands for justice, in movements across the globe.

The idea of, and movements around, environmental justice continue to grow. From lead contamination of water in Flint, to infringement of Aboriginal rights for coal mines in Queensland, to the impacts of climate change on vulnerable communities in the global south, environmental justice is embraced as a powerful organising discourse and demand.

What is the future of Environmental Justice? What are some current trends and directions in both scholarship and activism? How can the idea of environmental justice be used to respond to new and ongoing environmental crises – and continued economic and political power arrayed against safe, just, and sustainable environments?

This panel, made up of both longstanding leaders in environmental justice scholarship and new important voices, reflects on the meaning, and potential, of environmental justice as an idea, as an organising discourse, and as a political demand.
