No justification for enhanced police search powers

The lessons of the Haneef case are being ignored, say FLEUR JOHNS and MATTHEW KALYK

There is a certain irony that as we raft into the 21st century, human rights are designed to be the bedrock of liberal democracy. Yet the very individual freedoms we are guaranteed are the ones at risk from a creeping police state designed to protect us. The successful surveillance of a young Sydney woman, Reihaneh Haneef, is not the isolated incident it appears. The case demonstrates that the liberal nation we thought we knew can be a dangerous place.

Cuts in carbon emissions must be achieved as soon as possible to avoid a dangerous increase in global temperatures. Yet in the case of climate change, everyone is in a hurry to get to the destination. This is where a police officer suspects a terrorist and authorises a search of premises: a gray area.

Coalition can profit from ETS

PETER BRETENotes the same strategy, extract something from the scheme's implementation and then start carving

Nicholas Stuart is a Canberra writer.

The Rudd government's program to combat climate change, known as the Emissions Trading Scheme (ETS), is a key component of the Coalition's economic strategy. The ETS is a market-based approach to reducing greenhouse gas emissions by placing a price on carbon and allowing businesses to buy and sell the right to emit.

The ETS is intended to reduce greenhouse gas emissions by creating a market for carbon credits, which will then be used to finance projects that reduce emissions elsewhere. The idea is that the market will provide the most cost-effective way to achieve the required reductions.

The ETS is based on the premise that carbon emissions are a cause of climate change and that reducing them will help to slow or stop the process. However, the science behind climate change is not yet fully understood, and there are many uncertainties about the best way to reduce emissions.

The ETS is also controversial because it is a market-based approach, which some argue is too slow and uncertain. Critics argue that other approaches, such as direct action and regulation, would be more effective.

The ETS has been controversial since its inception, and the Coalition is doing all it can to ensure that it is a success. The Coalition has made it clear that it will do everything in its power to ensure that the ETS is a success, and will not support any measures that would undermine it.

This is a clear indication of the Coalition's commitment to the ETS, and their willingness to do all they can to ensure its success. The Coalition has also made it clear that they will not tolerate any attempts to undermine the ETS, and will take strong action to ensure that it is a success.

In conclusion, the ETS is a key component of the Coalition's economic strategy, and the Coalition is committed to ensuring its success. The Coalition will do all it can to ensure that the ETS is a success, and will not tolerate any attempts to undermine it.