Kevin Meagher

Kevin Meagher is a Sydney artist whose practice is focused on portraits of mythological and spiritual figures. Meagher has been producing work for 6 years, and initiated his practice during time he spent in Hospital. Since then he has developed his body of work through involvement with the Pioneer Clubhouse specialised studio in Balgowlah on Sydney’s northern beaches as well as the Insideout Gallery and studio at Macquarie Hospital in North Ryde, where he has taken up the role of artist-in-residence.

Meagher is drawn to the study of eastern and western spiritual, astrological and religious belief systems: Norse, Greek, Slavic and ancient Egyptian mythology as well as Christianity and Hinduism have been referenced in his work. He amalgamates figures and allegories from these systems with each other, as well as with everyday objects and popular culture. In his body of work he pays no particular regard to any one system, though he is consistently drawn to depictions of Jesus, who has appeared in his work matched with such seemingly disparate and unlikely bedfellows as Mars, the Roman god of war, an everyday rubbish bin, and Kali, the Hindu goddess, who also appears regularly in his work.

Ever the iconoclast, Meagher is cavalier in his choice of combinations and pictorially unrelenting in their execution – there is little attention paid to traditional methods of detailing and beautifying sacred figures. The ceramic works, which are comparable to totemic artefacts or sacred offerings, are particularly unsettling to look at, such is the violence evident in their construction. Focusing on drawing, painting and ceramics, Meagher works quickly and with abandon, leaving traces of his process across the work – from frenetic ballpoint pen lines to mounds collected at the base of gouged channels of clay. It is easy to visualise his hand moving back and forth with a pen, or dragged across the surface of his ceramic works.

The effect of Meagher’s unrestrained process is art that is simultaneously jarring and compelling. His works, both on paper and in ceramics, are disquieting, but also contain an unexpected innocence and humour. These qualities are attributable perhaps to the use of highlighters and soft pastel tones, as well as to the unexpected, often humorous combinations that appear throughout. Humour is a particular strength of Meagher’s, something he demonstrates in works such as Hades Pluto, which merges Pluto and Hades into a single ceramic form. The Pluto that Meagher depicts is not the ruler of the underworld in ancient Greek mythology, however – it is Disney’s favourite cartoon dog.

Despite his irreverent subject matter and agitated aesthetic, Meagher is not, as one might think, making a disparaging philosophical statement on spirituality or its function within society – indeed, Meagher is highly spiritual himself and says that the work is inspired by his love of all gods. He uses the process of creation exclusively for his own ends, as a way of exploring and expanding his knowledge of mythology and religion and as part of a healing process for himself and those around him. It is challenging, compelling, highly experiential and intensely personal work – we are privileged to be allowed to share it with him.
