Health Policy focuses on how societies set their priorities, make decisions, and act to shape the health of populations.

Study with Us

The University of Sydney’s highly esteemed graduate program in health policy is taught in collaboration with the Menzies Centre for Health Policy; Australia’s leading academic contributor to national and international health policies.

Subjects are taught in full-day workshops and online components, making it ideal for people who live outside the Sydney metropolitan area.

Is this program for you?

The graduate program is for anyone working – or planning to work – in health services, strategy, policy or research. It builds the skills in policy analysis essential for shaping the health systems of the future.

- Our course adds value to people already working in health and policy to advance their careers at strategic and leadership levels.
- We focus on effectively using evidence to build convincing arguments for change.
- Our students graduate with theoretical and practical knowledge in policy analysis, strategy, health economics, business, financing and budgeting.
- Our students learn from real world examples the ‘story behind the story’ of systems, power, and politics in health policy.

Learn About
- Health systems
- Financing and health services
- Health politics, decision-making, priority setting
- Economics for health policy
- Getting evidence into policy
- Business and health
- Global health policy
- Health policy analysis
- Writing health policies
- Health policy research

Graduate with the professional confidence to work across the health sector.

Apply Now for the Available Courses
- Master of Health Policy
- Graduate Diploma in Health Policy
- Graduate Certificate in Health Policy

Contact
Course Director: Dr Carmen Huckel Schneider
E: carmen.huckelschneider@sydney.edu.au
W: sydney.edu.au/courses/programs/postgrad-health-policy